

Bombing Iran -Osirak And Beyond -Analysis - News - Views And Statistics (Special Report)

Tehran denies that it has military ambitions for its nuclear activities and it has pledged to continue its nuclear pursuits. The Institute for National Security Studies in Tel Aviv said time is running out to deal with Iran. Irans drive for regional hegemony is reflected primarily by its uncompromising efforts to achieve a military nuclear capability, the INSS (formerly the Jaffe Center for Strategic Studies) concluded in its annual report released in Jan-2007 Despite the growing concern within the international community, the INSS questions whether effective sanctions will be imposed. Time is working in Irans favour, and barring military action, Irans possession of nuclear weapons is only a matter of time. Dr. Zvi Shtaubert, director of the INSS, noted that the international community continues to reject the use of force. They are hoping some miracle will happen and it wont be necessary, he said. But, at the end of the road, the international community will discover that nothing helps, Shtaubert told Cybercast News Service. When a country [like Iran] has money, scientific know-how and determination, it is very hard to stop them, said Shtaubert, a former Israeli ambassador to Britain and former head of strategic planning in the Israeli army. Shtaubert said that however momentous the decision may be to attack Iran, the prospect of a nuclear-armed Iran is far worse.
