

An ontological and epistemological approach used by a Finnish physiologist and philosopher Yrjo Reenpaa (1894 – 1976) for the analysis of the physical, physiological and psychological entities in perception is being reviewed towards the background of his life work as the professor of physiology in Helsinki University. He based his own research on the continental psychophysical tradition and followed closely the developments in psychophysiology in the post-war years. In looking for ontological and epistemological background for the entities involved in perception research he found particularly in Immanuel Kant's transcendental approach and in phenomenology of Edmund Husserl and Martin Heidegger appropriate means to deal with the entities involved. His own experimental research, as briefly reviewed, took place in the pre-war years. He wrote his main philosophical papers and books in the post-war years providing what can be designated as a phenomenological theory of perception. The three authors are his pupils and collaborators from his last years in office in the Department of Physiology of Helsinki University. Later they have made their own careers in the fields of clinical medicine and in linguistics.
